

Spanish Sherry

What is Sherry?

Sherry is a fortified wine from southern Spain. It is made from the Palomino, Moscatel and Pedro Ximenez grapes and is known for its wide range of styles, from very dry to very sweet.

Where is Sherry Made? (The Sherry Triangle)

Sherry is only produced in a specific region in southwest Spain Andalusia, province of Cadiz known as the "Sherry Triangle." It includes three main towns:

- Jerez de la Frontera (Main center of sherry production)
- Sanlúcar de Barrameda (Coastal)
- El Puerto de Santa María (Important aging and export Hub)

How is Sherry Fortified?

Sherry becomes fortified by adding a neutral grape spirit (a distilled alcohol made from grapes). Spanish brandy

- This process increases the alcohol level
- The alcohol level determines the style of sherry

Soil (Albariza)

The region is known for its unique white soil called albariza.

- Chalky, limestone-rich soil
- Retains water very well
- Helps grapes survive the hot, dry climate
- Contributes to the fresh and mineral character of sherry
